

ABSTRACT

Novikov et al. measured colloidal plutonium several kilometers from Lake Karachai and used this to support colloid facilitated transport in groundwater. We suggest other possible mechanisms and show experiments where colloidal plutonium is remobilized using their fast sampling rates. These issues have important implications for plutonium transport and nuclear waste.